In collaboration with the Jewish Museum Munich

In the late 19th century, a German-Jewish immigrant in the US changed the world. With Emil Berliner's invention of the gramophone and the record, the age of mass entertainment had found its first global medium.

Over a time period of one hundred years, shellac and vinyl were the sound carriers of popular culture. On them, all the experiences of the 20th century, its utopias and catastrophes, illusions and hopes condensed. The record, mass produced and guided by collective taste, was at the same time an expression of individual identity and an object of ritual.

Jewish experience of the 20th century, too, has found its expression on records – from the introduction of synagogue music into the middle-class Jewish home to the re-invention of Jewish folk music; from the career of Yiddish theater songs on Broadway to the rebels of punk.

The history of shellac and vinyl is also a history of Jewish inventors, musicians, composers, music producers and songwriters. Their music, the sound of the 20th century, its best-known songs, musicals and soundtracks was not always “Jewish” music—but still a product of Jewish experience.

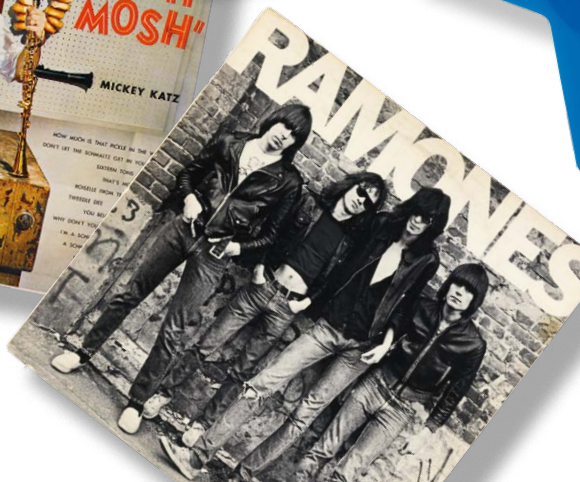

Jukebox. Jewkbox! presents this history from the first gramophones and shellac records to the dissolution of this medium in the World Wide Web.

A journey of discovery through some all too familiar as well as numerous unfamiliar worlds, accompanied by personal stories about records that have changed many a life.
